

What Learning Disability England members think

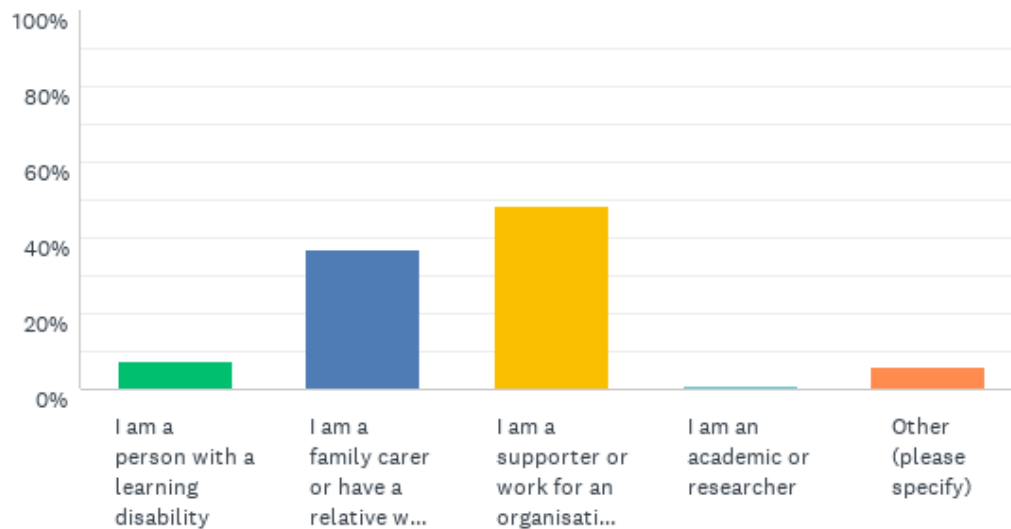

We asked our members what they thought about the advisory group's recommendations

21 people with a Learning Disability

102 family members or carers

134 people supporting people with a Learning Disabilities in different roles told us what they thought

We asked which of the priorities do you think is most important.

Lots of self-advocates said recommendation 1 was the most important to them.

They wanted accessible information at the same time as everyone else

Lots of Family, support staff and professionals said recommendation 3 was the most important to them.

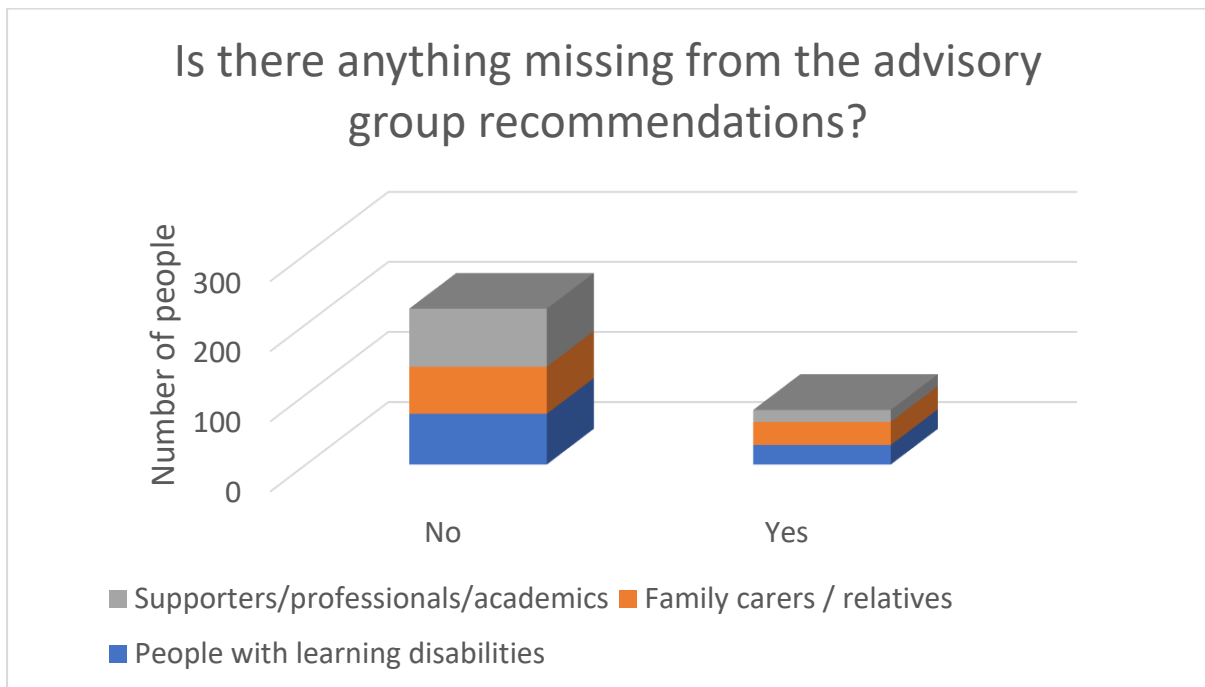

They want to make sure all support services have enough money and support to do their job

We asked

Do you think the 5 big recommendations from the Advisory Group are right?

Most people thought the recommendations were right or mostly right.

We asked the people who thought the recommendations weren't right what was missing

Some people said things that were in the report's extra recommendations.

Like;

- Self-advocacy is important, and we need to make sure people can get involved.

- Blanket restrictions on visiting people in residential care or supported living are unfair and has a huge impact

Some people said things that the report doesn't say outright:

- The taskforce was looking at social care. But we need to remember it's not just about people having good services. It's about people having good lives.

- The recommendations talk about people being isolated or lonely. We need a stronger focus on mental health generally.

- The report says the recommendations should happen through coproduction but doesn't say what that would look like. People worried that people often say things are co-produced when they aren't.
